[...]your grain supply [...]all of your home[...]ats, and barley? [...]ain enough energy?

Most home-grown grains are high in net energy as are the oil meals.

Does it have enough protein? Dairy cows need from 12 to 16% protein, depending on the quality of the forage available.

Does it have enough variety? So far as a cow's stomach is concerned, variety is unimportant, but it stimulates appetite.

Does it have enough bulk In most cases, the roughage supplies the cow's need for bulk.

Does it have enough minerals A 1% salt and 1% dicalcium phosphate will supply all needed minerals unless a particular deficiency is known.

Is it economical? Soybean oil meal is one of the cheapest sources of protein. Too many dairymen continue to use large amounts of molasses even though it is not one of the more economical feeds.

Appomattox dairymen would do well to study their grain feeding program, particularly during this period of high feed costs. Many would save from $5 to $20 per ton of grain if they used more home-grown grain. The grain should be fed to the herd on the basis of what each cow is producing. By using home-grown grains and by feeding according to production, dairymen can do a lot to help themselves out of the cost-price squeeze.

Zinc Used to Treat Parakeratosis In Swine

Zinc is being used effectively to treat a serious mange-like disease of hogs called parakeratosis.

Livestock specialists of the U. S. Department of Agriculture cured disease and also pepped up the pigs generally by increasing the amount of zinc in the pig's diet to 80 parts per million. Parakeratosis has been inadvertently caused i nthe past by feeding mineral mixtures with too much high-calcium bone meal and little or no zinc.

A lot still needs to be done to determine how much of such trace elements the animels need.
